East of Nakba (54)

Part II. Ethnic cleanser

Chapter 54 Devil's invention (2)

Dr. Girgo chose medical science as his job because he hated the monotonous farm work on a kibbutz. He aimed to be a doctor in search of wealth and fame. When he entered college, he selected a researcher course rather than a general physician course. It was not the result of his self-judgement whether he was suited for research job or not. It was his ambition to get reputation in the medical field.

If he consulted patients as a general physician in sophisticated manner, he made them happy. He would be happy, too. However, it is nothing more than gratitude or admiration from one patient. Sometimes the family of patient would appreciate him. His reputation might go up. However, Doctor Girgo could not be satisfied such petty happiness. He was greedy for wealth and fame.

His ambition was to make a discovery that would amaze the world. He dreamed if he could win a Nobel Prize. He, of course, was a realist and did not put too much confidence in himself to achieve world-class discoveries. The Nobel Prize was just his dream. But as a young man he was obsessed with the dream of achieving fame. He believed that fame would follow wealth.

His method of chasing the dream was extremely realistic. To get fame, he focused his effort in the field where the public would pay attention. He concluded that the field to be tackled was the study of pathology based on genetics.

He thought that it would be difficult to attract the interest of government or media on pure academic or plain research. He came up with the impressive idea of decoding the genetic code of Jews and proving that the Jewish people were the most superior of all humankind.

He also thought that once Jewish genetic code could be decoded, it would be possible to increase the reproductivity of Jews by genetic manipulation. In Israel, the rate of increase of the Arab population exceeded that of the Jewish population. This meant that the population ratio between Jews and Arabs might be reversed in the near future. Jews were seriously concerned about this fact.

Therefore, it would be highly appreciated to increase the number of Jews by biological means. Doctor Girgo concluded.
